General Secretary & CEO

Dear Friends and Members of the NDY,

Greetings in His precious name!

It is now time at the NDY to plan out its activities and programmes for the coming business year. Teams are at work, working out financials for this at one side while on the other side the leadership is busy formulating policies, road maps and action plans towards consolidation and growth post-pandemic, course correction, expansion and overall sustainability of your organisation. And it is the time when all the stakeholders join hands and minds, leaving aside any personal preferences, prejudices, conflict of interest, etc and work for the overall strengthening of the Y movement in general and the NDY in particular. And in turn, each one of the stakeholders, the staff, the executives, the secretariat, the Board members and especially the membership gets responsibilities and duties along with the privileges and rights.

The staff and secretariat must compliment the policies and vision of the Board with dedication and mutual trust. The Board must deliberate to move forward and not for stalling or regression. There should be no room for any personal benefit and conflict of interest, whether direct or perceived.

And the most important responsibility is of the members so as to ensure the selection and election of Board Members again keeping aside personal likes, preferences or relationships and choosing only those candidates who are forward-thinking, not aligned to any perceived power centres, not having any personal agendas, must have a global vision and overall committed to the Lord and The Mission. Watch out for this space as it is time now to be prepared to take your organisation forward to fulfil the mission.

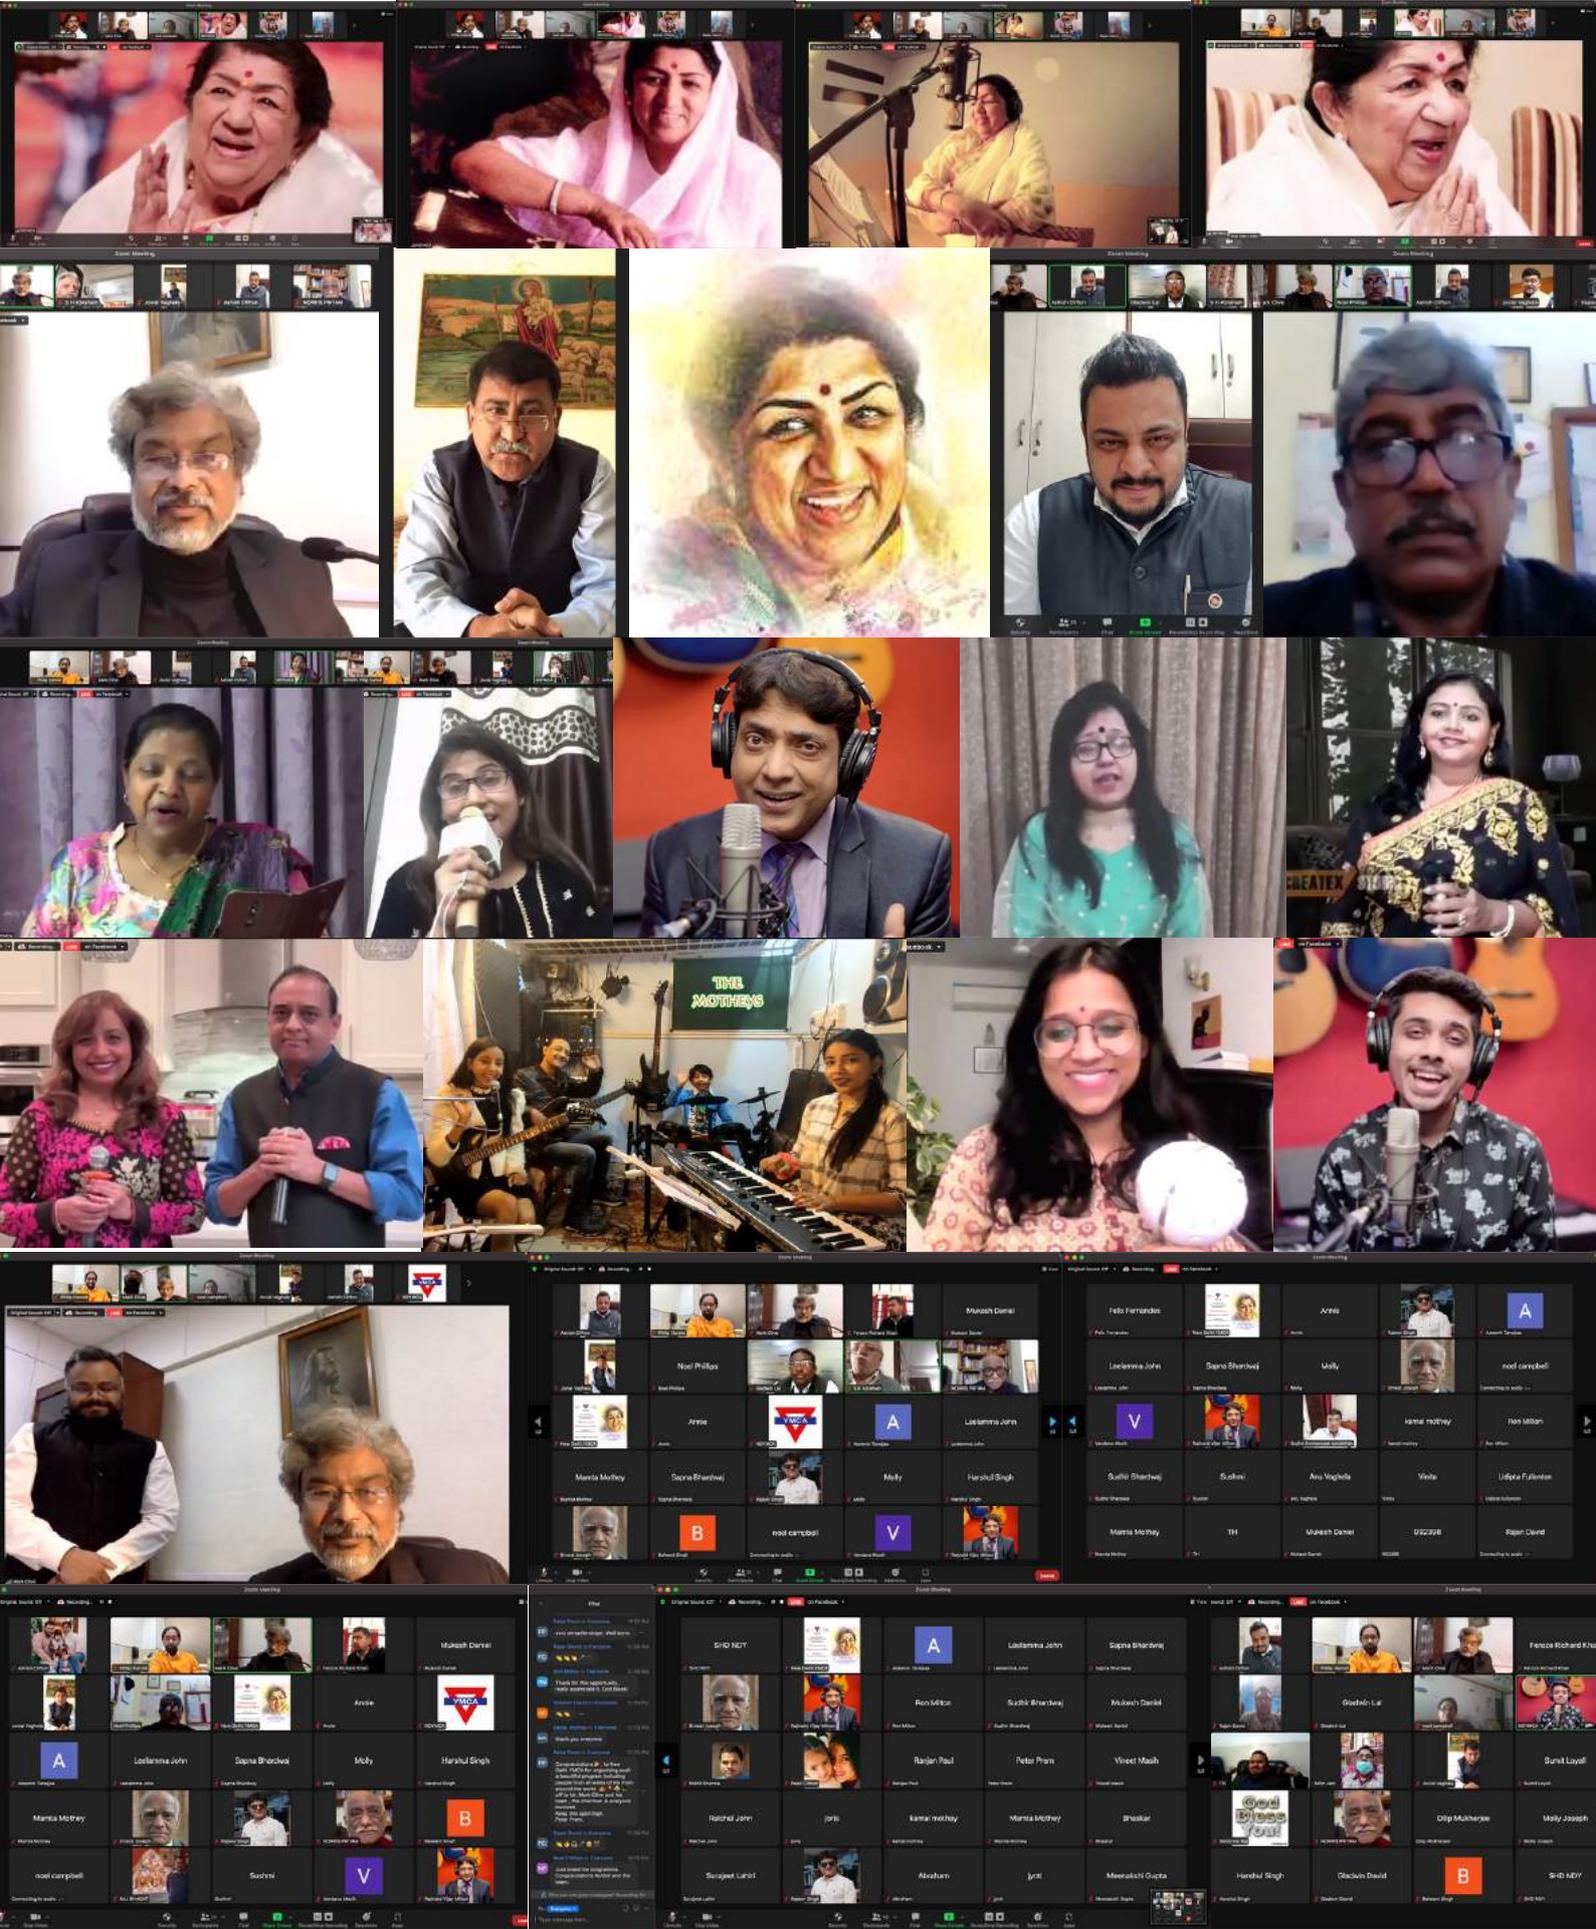

Please continue to keep NDY, its activities and the Mission in your prayers.

Regards and God bless!
Jovial Vaghela
President

Ringside view of YMCA Boxing

In the years gone by, YMCA Boxing Championship was a Blue Ribbon event in the Indian sports calendar. In fact, the championship revived boxing in India. Several juniors, who began their career at the YMCA Championship went on to perform well in the national and international arenas. Several Padma Shri and Arjun Award winners are the product of the YMCA Boxing ring! Mohammed Qamar Ali shot into the limelight in the YMCA Championship and then went on to become the first Indian to win a gold medal in the Commonwealth Games in 2002 in Manchester. Currently, he is the national coach. Akhil Kumar repeated the feat at the Commonwealth Games in Melbourne in 2006. Olympic bronze medallist Vijender Singh also began his career as a sub-junior at the YMCA Championship. Arjun Awardee Dharmendra Yadav is another YMCA product. Presently a national coach, Dharmendra was India's first Pro International Boxer. The Championship was widely covered in national media. T R RAMAKRISHNAN (Indian Express and The Straits Times, Singapore) also covered the Championship in its initial days. He walks down memory lane to recreate the magic of the YMCA Boxing Championship.

Memory plays strange tricks. Looking back on my days as a sports reporter in the late 1970s and 1980s, it seems now that the YMCA Boxing Championships had been going on forever, an established feature of the Delhi sports calendar from time immemorial. Google, however, shatters illusions faster than you can key in n-o-s-t-a-l-g-i-a. One of the few articles Google God threw up says the 23rd YMCA Boxing Championships was held in 2000. I'm not that old then to work out that the first would have been in 1978, the very year I joined Indian Express Delhi as an apprentice reporter. So, it was then, an honor and privilege that my Sports Editor K R Wadhwaney asked me to cover the event within a year on the job.

Boxing, for most people in those days, meant Muhammad Ali, and for those with a little more knowledge about the sport, a few others like Joe Louis, Rocky Marciano, Sonny Liston, Joe Frazier, and George Foreman. The YMCA Boxing Championships of course wasn't in this heavyweight league but it had within a short span of its institution become the most important event in the country, second only to the National Championships; however, to many insiders of the sport, it was THE most important.

The championships were held in January-February, in the large courtyard - where the tennis courts were -- behind the YMCA Tourist Hostel on Jaisingh Road; The Ring was set up, with attending paraphernalia like changing rooms, warming-up areas, etc; all tented, canvas structures with assistance, no doubt, from The Army -- from where most of the competing boxers came. There were hundreds of entries for the Championships -- so many age and weight categories; the event started on a Monday, with bouts beginning at 4 pm each day and going past 10 pm, even up to midnight. The excitement built up day by day, reaching a crescendo on the weekend when the semi-final and final bouts were contested; under lights on crispy cold winter nights. For a rookie reporter, this was a wonderful experience, learning the ropes in the best possible way. Sitting ringside, as close to the fight as anyone but the boxers themselves; getting coached not only in the technicalities of the sport but also the jargon of reporting by helpful seniors. There was Ramu Sharma, a former Delhi Amateur Boxing Association official and a sports reporter with The Statesman.

Ramu and Commander T Rowe, if memory serves me right, were key organizers. There were other familiar figures among the officials, none more so than Keith Flory, another Statesman reporter. Decked in the starched white shirt and trousers of the referee -- do I imagine this or did he actually wear a black bow tie? -- he would be in the middle of the ring, barking out "Box" to start proceedings.

Most of the competitors were from the military. The best of them came from the Madras Sappers (MEG Bangalore), coached by 1972 Munich Olympian Muniswamy Venu and Chander Narayanan. The Sappers were all skill and craft, in contrast to the hardy and stronger boxers from the Kumaon and Gorkha regiments, who produced most of the other title contenders.

But it wasn't always that the "superior" boxer won. One year, flyweight Issac Amaldas, Moscow Olympian and one of India's best stylists, was considered a shoo-in for the title but he was knocked out in an early-round by one of the Kumaonis. "He just walked into a punch," was the lament of a connoisseur. And then the MEG guys could be sluggers too, like Christo Raj. Two years in a row he won his weight class and scored so many knock-outs wins that he was nicknamed Kayo King. The audience loved the bouts between these differently styled combatants. Crowds at the Championships grew as the days progressed and for the weekend climax, the place would be jam-packed. They were a mix of civilians, mainly Anglo-Indians (a surprising number of women among them), and jawans out to support the fighters of their regiments.

Nothing roused the crowd like a blow that would draw blood. (This was boxing in the days before helmets were mandatory -- and the bouts were of three rounds, each lasting three minutes.) The fans would be up and screaming, asking their man to finish the fight with a knock-out. The overwhelming favorite with which to deliver that knock-out blow was the Upper Cut. "Up-ray Cut, Up-ray Cut" they would shriek, their pitch getting higher and higher with each blood-drawing punch.

"Pounding Action. Searing Passion. The YMCA Boxing Championship was Amateur Sports at its Entertaining Best"
